HONGKONG, MAY 1ST, 1893.

The Australian mail received by the Changsha on Saturday brings detailed news of the suspension of the Commercial Bank, and the commencement of the crisis which is now playing such havoc with the banking institutions of the Colonies. As will be seen from the telegram published in another column, still another failure has to be added to the already long list. And these failures are the more significant inasmuch as they have taken place in spite of proffered assistance from the Victorian Government and the associated banks. In March a public notification was issued of the agreement of the associated banks in Melbourne to "render financial assistance to each other" in case of emergency. The guarantee was of a rather nebulous character, but when the Commercial Bank found itself in distress it took the practical form of an offer to advance, with the help of the Government, about £2,000,000 if this sum could be regarded as an effective provision.
It was felt by the directors and the general managers of the Commercial Bank, however, that the time was past at which any definite amount could be named, and they therefore asked for the united financial support of the banks to such an extent as might be required. The associated banks could not see their way to rendering assistance to an individual amount and the only alternative left was to suspend business. It was then intimated by the Premier that if any other institutions should be threatened, the Government, in conjunction with the other banks, would be prepared to step in and give the same assistance that was offered to the Commercial Bank of Australia, and the belief was expressed that the aid which was not regarded as sufficient by the latter, with its heavy engagements, would be more than sufficient for any of the smaller institutions. This belief has not been justified by the result, for following the failure of the Commercial Bank, the Australian Joint Stock Bank, the London Chartered Bank of Australia, and the Standard Bank of Australia, all in 1893, and only one of them, the cause of the trouble in the collapse of the land boom in Victoria. Money borrowed at comparatively short notice has been looked up in land and house property, the value of which had been rushed up to inflation prices, and when the inevitable collapse came the banks were unable to realize their assets to meet the withdrawals by timid depositors. The colony of Victoria, with its rich natural resources, will make a good recovery from the disaster which has befallen it, but the bank failures must bring ruin and untold misery to many individuals and business will be impeded for some time to come. There must have been something very defective in a system of banking that has broken down so lamentably under a strain which might so readily have been borne.
